The credit used to finance the firm activity (or the financial leverage) has profound implications. First, the creditors are analyzing the volume of the resources capital or the volume of the l involved in firm in order to determine the security of the credit demanded. Second, by obtaining the credit, the owners are keeping the control of the firm although they have invested a limited amount of funds. Third, if the firm following the use of the credits is gaining more than the sum paid as interest, then this surplus determine the rise of the results obtained.
