Agricultural exploitations to attempt at realizing certain performance parameters, in order to allow them pervading in different markets. These markets are, in their turn directly influenced by what is called globalization. Although Romanian agriculture is dominated by the private sector, this alone cannot assure an stable economic growth. The main direction of agricultural politics must be orientated towards a new course of development, one able to eliminate the productivity gaps and bring us nearer the European performance.

The main problem of the structural adjustment process in agriculture is represented by the turning of sustenance family agricultural exploitations into mixed commercial agricultural exploitations. The latter tend to create performative agricultural co-operative societies, in order to be prepared for joining the European Union structures.
