

Fundamental role played by capital and investments in holding development

NAGY Andrea, GOȘA V. - USAMVB Timisoara

Capital represents one of the motive factors for the holding redressing. Holding development is conditioned by the possibility of investing, acquiring and using production factors corresponding to the objectives aimed at, to increase productivity and to reduce production costs, to obtain competitive products for the internal and external market. The extremely reduced investment effort in agriculture is characteristic for the last decade. This reduced investment effort has been reflected in the slow increase of capital goods and, beside them, in production levels, costs, efficiency and competitiveness, and also in the development of agricultural production.