

Perspective de dezvoltare durabilă a agroturismului montan în context actual și al schimbărilor climatice

UNGUREANU D. - Centrul de Formare și Inovație pentru Dezvoltare în Carpați – CEFIDEC, Vatra
Dornei

In order to answer to the current needs without affecting the development capacity of the future generations, sustainable development is closely connected to the environment and its balance, thus the attractions and splendors provided would have continuity in time. The sustainable tourism performed in the mountains represents the development of all tourism types, through a tourism management and marketing that respects the mountain's natural, social and economical integrity in such a manner that the use of natural and cultural resources is done for the benefit of the future generations. Sustainable development of mountain agri-tourism in the current context and in the context of the climate changes implies the preservation of natural and anthropic resources, with the purpose of using them in the future, the increase of the living conditions for the local communities and better knowledge and awareness of the idea of preservation for the local population. The farm, the village and the rural space, together or separate, give charm to the rural tourism. Rural tourism must be perceived as a type of activity that provides the urban population with the most adequate conditions for stress therapy, determined by the noisy daily city life