Abstract

Ensuring food security consists in ensuring the amount of food needed by people and is part of ensuring national security. Food security takes into account both the need to ensure a sufficient agricultural supply and to ensure the economic access of the population to food, the stability of the supply and the way of using food at the individual level. The involvement of the political factor in these efforts is not sufficient, thus justifying the appearance of state bodies or different forms of population organization. This paper argues, based on the study of normative acts he need to involve the population in the free exchange of seeds, its first step in ensuring quality, tasty and safe vegetable products.
